The Dinklaker House of Health was the nation's first co-operative medical center. Owner-operator Dr. Phineas Dinklaker rented well-equipped rooms to other physicians who couldn't afford the exorbitant start-up expenses of their own surgical facilities, supplies, and staff. That was the plan, anyway. Unfortunately, due to poor market research, Dr. Dinklaker opened his business in Flotsam, Ohio, population 29. And no doctor worth his Hypocritical Oath wanted to work where there was no business clientele. The medical center was heading towards certain fiscal ruin when Dr. Dinklaker hit upon the idea of reinventing House of Health as an occupant-hostile business. Sure enough, within a week, "Doctors Without Boarders" was turning a tidy profit.
