

Guptil

The watery yellow eyes and withered, translucent skin of Victor Frankenstein's first reanimated creature did it no favors in the Charm Department; no wonder the sensationalist tabloids of the day labeled it a "monster!" So, once the furor over "Buddy" (the creature's real name) and his undeniably monstrous exploits died down, Victor took some time to rethink his ideas of reanimation. Most importantly, he wanted to involve other people, so if things went awry again he could spread the blame around. Ergo he hired Dinklaker Humanoid Design to build "Guptil," a better and way bigger reanimated being. The project was going swimmingly until Victor's luck at the track ran out, and his finances drained faster than Guptil's all too lifelike sinuses. No matter Guptil was only two eyes, a pate, and an improved Frankenbrain away from completion, DHD stopped construction. Unable to secure a new line of credit, a frustrated Frankenstein simply walked away from his dream project. Later, a passing cyclone filled Guptil with rainwater, turning him into a reservoir that today serves as a convenient stopover for migrating whooping cranes.