

Incognito

Last year, when Congress slashed the admittedly pork-laden budget of the U.S. Marshals Service, one of the first casualties was the Incognito Division of the Witness Protection Program. Gone, suddenly, were the makeup, wigs, glasses, artificial heads, and other sophisticated appearance-altering devices that helped give new identities to endangered witnesses of crime. In its place was ... well, a recent gathering of currently protected witnesses speaks for itself.