

Jeeves

It was highly unusual for any member of the U.S. Navy Sea, Air, and Land Forces – commonly known as the SEALs – to travel with a valet. Yet Lieutenant Adonis Dinklaker did so without provoking any animosity from his fellow special ops team members. That was because “Jeeves” (not his real name) was as adept in anti-guerrilla warfare and underwater demolition as he was at brewing a fine cup o’ java or delousing a pair of Kevlar trousers under the most horrific conditions. When Dinklaker’s team was assigned to Project “The Emperor Has Clothes”, a covert reconnaissance of suspicious penguin activity in Antarctica, it was Jeeves who came up with the SEALs’ camouflage that so seamlessly blended in with the natural surroundings. And no matter the clever manservant had numerous responsibilities to his team, he was always there to whip out that broly and shade his employer from the harsh rays of the South polar sun. No wonder he was awarded the Medal of Valet-Valor! (The only downside: it was a posthumous honor.)
